although they do not apply for a scholarship, they meet the real spiritual need in the West. These westernized versions are designed to make the wisdom of Tao Te Jing more accessible to modern English-speaking readers, usually using more familiar cultural and temporal references. Translation difficulties This section needs additional citations to verify. Please help improve this article by adding quotes to reliable sources. Non-sources of materials can be challenged and removed. (January 2018) (Learn how and when to delete this template message) Tao Te Jing is written in classic Chinese, which creates a number of problems for full understanding. As Holmes Welch points out, written language has no active or passive language, no singular, no plural, no business, no person, no tense, no mood. In addition, the resulting text lacks many grammatical particles that are stored in the old texts of Mawangui and Beida, allowing the text to be more accurate. Finally, many passages of Tao Te Jin are deliberately vague and ambiguous. Since there are no punctuation marks in classical Chinese, it can be difficult to definitively determine where one sentence ends and the next begins. Moving a full stop a few words forward or backward or inserting a comma can fundamentally change the meaning of many passages, and such separations and meanings must be determined by the translator. Some editors and translators claim that the resulting text is so spoiled (from originally written on single bamboo stripes associated with silk threads) that it is impossible some chapters without moving character sequences from one place to another.
